$100,000 awarded to help save our Aussie species

24 July 2017: Two recently funded volunteer projects tackling the issue of endangered species are enhancing wetland habitat for bird species and protecting remnant vegetation in Western Australia.

Destruction and encroachment of native habitats by humans, feral animals, and introduced plant species has contributed to 161 species now classified as endangered. Thanks to the volunteer efforts of thousands of Australians, there is hope for saving our treasured animals from extinction.

In 2017, $100,000 was awarded to 10 Landcare groups to undertake habitat restoration projects across Australia. The funding was made possible via Landcare Australia's Workplace Giving Program, which works in partnership with 23 businesses across the country, including Telstra, Qantas, and Konica Minolta.

It is expected that Blackwood Basin Group's project will significantly enhance wetland habitat for bird species through revegetation, protection of existing habitat, and the creation and installation of three floating islands. The project will increase nesting sites and habitat for wetland fauna species, including 14 that are listed as significant to the area.

"Creating a safe habitat around the wetlands for significant species is extremely important to ensure not only their survival, but also assisting their breeding and nesting opportunities," said Brian Chambers of Blackwood Basin Group.

Wellstead Community Resource Centre's project will, among other things, install five hectares of provenance flora species in buffer plantings and wildlife corridors, reconnecting over 180 hectares of high diversity remnant vegetation on Wilyun Pools Farm.

"It is the vision of Wilyun Pools Farm to be a local, state, national and international demonstration site where long term environmental monitoring helps find the balance between agricultural food production and careful management of landscape ecological health for a better future. I feel our project on Wilyun Pools Farm just continues to build and develop on many of the past activities undertaken within the District over the last three decades," said Sylvia Leighton, of WCRC.

Landcare Australia's Workplace Giving Program is an easy way for employees to contribute to charity from pre-tax income.
